EPOS 257: Fire Mountain

17 April – 30 December 2019

The City of Prague Museum has prepared two exhibitions about poverty and social exclusion. The Poor Prague exhibition provides a perspective on Prague social issues during the 19th century and, primarily, in the 1st half of the 20th century. Historical images, mainly photographs and prints, document the surviving strategy of the destitute, depicting the places where the poor lived, and present the social care institutions of the time. The contemporary artist EPOS 257 has designed the Fire Mountain exhibition. Using photographs, films, and 3D artefacts, he depicts the history of the recently disappeared homeless community in Prague-Třebešín, including the subjective level of legends and myths that relate to this area.

Children are invited to the world of adventure and to play a game whose goal is to present the world of the four Čtyřlístek characters to today's children. The 'adult' line of the exhibition presents the development of the comic book over the past fifty years.

Prague 1606 in Motion

from 22 May 2019

In 1606 the prominent graphic artist and publisher, Aegidius Sadeler, portrayed the capital of the Kingdom of Bohemia to show it to the city and the world. Philip van den Bossche turned it into a drawing after which Johann Wechter produced a copperplate. In 2019, we introduce a nine-metre animation that provides a view of life in Prague during the rule of Rudolf II. A new Sadeler Prospect is the outcome of joint efforts of historians and modern technology specialists.

Prague of Charles IV – A View of Medieval Town

The beginning of the exhibition focuses on Prague urbanism and its transformation during the 14th century in the time of Charles IV and the House of Luxembourg. The second part emphasises the life of medieval inhabitants. The videomapping of Charles Square is the exhibition's highlight. Further visualisations are illustrative of the importance of the river, fords, and bridges as well as the administration of the Prague conurbation.
